There are a few reasons why purchasing produce that is in season is important. The first reason is that it is typically cheaper. The produce that is in season is grown locally, so the transportation costs are lower. The second reason is that it is more nutritious.

The produce that is in season is picked when it is ripe, so it has more nutrients than the produce that is picked before it is ripe and then shipped long distances.

The third reason is that it is more environmentally friendly. The produce that is in season is grown locally, so there is less of an impact on the environment from transportation.
